This drawing, often labeled in error as Barnabas Horton (1600-1680), is actually of JONATHAN GOLDSMITH HORTON. He was a 3rd great grandson of Barnabas and the last Horton descendant to live in the house before it was torn down in 1878. It was included on a memorial drawing about Barnabas Horton's house in Southold, Long Island. "J. G. Horton Esq" is seen on the jacket at bottom of picture.

Penn's Frame of Government. — During the months which passed before his own journey to America, Penn occupied much time and thought in shaping a plan, or, as he called it, a "Frame of Government," for his province. In the composition of this document he sought the advice of Algernon

LOCAL HISTORY ARTICLES

For many years, Monroe County Historical Association Executive Director Amy Leiser wrote a monthly column on local history that was published in the Pocono Record. Here is a collection of those articles, plus occasional articles from other contributors

The early days of 'Penn's Woods'

William Penn was born October 14, 1644 and was n was greeted with large crowds of supporters. Philadelphia was a tolerant and bustling city of 3,000 with merchants, tree-lined streets, and schoothe son of royalist Sir William Penn, a famous Admiral who served in the British Navy famous Admiral who served in the British Navy.

Young William was raised during the unstable time in England of Oliver Cromwell's reign and the Glorious Revolution. At the age of 15, Penn met Thomas Loe, a Quaker missionary who taught him the Quaker beliefs of pacifism and equality. A few years later, while at school in Oxford, Penn developed his individuality and philosophy of life and became sympathetic to the Quaker religion. Raised an Anglican, Penn converted to Quakerism at the age of 22, much to the extreme disapproval of his father.

The King of England owed William Penn's father £16,000. To repay his debt, King Charles II granted the young Penn 45,000 square miles of land to establish a colony in "regard to the memorie and merits of his late father" on March of land to establish a colony in “regard to the memorie and merits of his late father” on March 4, 1681. The land for this colony was to be located between the 39th and 42nd degrees north latitude and from the start of the Delaware River continuing westward 5 degrees longitude.

Penn first referred to his land as “New Wales” and then “Sylvania” (meaning woods or forest in Latin). King Charles added “Penn” to the title in honor of Admiral Penn. The younger William Penn was only 37 years old when he gained sovereign rule of the new territory known as Pennsylvania.

Penn worked quickly to establish a colony like no other in the New World. He recruited fellow Englishmen of every trade and skill to join him.

Englishmen of every trade and skill to join him. From simple farmers to wealthy businessmen, Penn needed every type of settler (or “adventurer,” as he called them) to help create a successful colony. In 1682, with his strong Quaker ideals in place, Penn left England for Pennsylvania onboard the ship named the Welcome.

Penn created a town at the mouth of the Delaware River to promote commerce and government; he named the town, Philadelphia which was Greek for “city of brotherly love.” To ensure his colony would remain peaceful, Penn purchased the land from the local Native Americans. He also comforted groups of Dutch settlers who had already lived along the Delaware River that his colony was one of acceptance and that they would be free from religious persecution...

Establishing laws and a sound government was crucial to the survival of Pennsylvania. An Assembly was formed in order to develop a government created by the people with laws embodying Quaker ideals, quite a different approach from the laws established in England.

Having an Assembly would ensure that power did not fall into the hands of only one person – including Penn himself. This government was based on Quaker ethics. Two legislative houses would protect citizens' property and business ventures and would impose taxes fairly. All cases were to be heard before a jury, and prisons were designed to focus on correcting behavior rather designed to focus on correcting behavior rather than merely holding captives. The death penalty was still applicable in cases of treason and murder. After many drafts, Penn wrote The Charter of Privileges in 1701; this document lasted until the start of the American Revolution, when it was replaced by the State Constitution (https://www.monroehistorical.org/articles\_files/030809\_penn.html).

The very first Thanksgiving took place several hundred miles from Philadelphia, and happened about fifty years before William Penn set foot on the soil that became Philadelphia. Nevertheless, this time of year it's easy to wonder what Penn must have thought when he first hopped off the boat in the fall of 1682 after a long voyage from England.

Most of the early descriptions of Pennsylvania relate to the fecundity of the land. These were written as part of an extensive recruiting effort to get more people to settle here. Descriptions detailing thriving crops, animals fattening on rich pasture, and peaches falling from the trees tempted settlers from England.

We also know from correspondence that Penn

We also know from correspondence that Penn was completely smitten with the natural landscape. He wrote “The woods are adorned with lovely flowers . . . I have seen the gardens of London best stored with that sort of beauty but think they may be improved by our woods.”

The England he left behind had beautiful forests and parkland (mostly private,) but fall color was muted at best. The leaves on most deciduous English trees turn brown or tan before falling to the ground.

Yet in the New World different types of maples blazed red and yellow, alongside purple sweetgum and orange sassafras. Sumac glowed, and towering tulip poplars showered golden leaves onto the ground far below. The first few leaves onto the ground far below. The first few waves of European immigrants would have had a hard time believing their eyes, when the magic trick that is American autumn began to unfold.

It didn't take long for the seeds of the great American trees to get back to Europe, thanks to our own John Bartram. Today the trees of various continents are salted pretty evenly throughout the temperate parts of the globe.

Imagine if Penn hadn't been so taken with the forests he found in the New World. Instead of naming his new territory Penn's Sylvania (Penn's Woods) he might have chosen a different name for the colony, and we would be living someplace else. Pennessee? Penntucky? Pennsiana?
